Charlotte Mason on Music Study

“Let the young people hear good music as often as possible, and that under instruction. It is a pity we like our music, as our pictures and our poetry, mixed, so that there are few opportunities of going through, as a listener, a course of the works of a single composer. But this is to be aimed at for the young people; let them study occasionally the works of a single great master until they have received some of his teaching, and know his style.” (Formation of Character, p. 235)

How to Use Music Study with the Masters

1. Play the music recordings often and mention the composer's name when you do. You can play them as background music during a meal, while running errands in the car, at nap time or bedtime, or while the students work on some handwork. (Try not to keep them playing all day or during noisy times when other sounds or conversation would distract.) Encourage students to describe what the various pieces make them think of, to “draw the music” with art, or to move to the music. Allow them to form their own relations with it.
2. Read the A Day in the Life biography to the students and ask them to narrate. Enter this composer in your Book of Centuries. You can assign the The Story of Handel expanded biography to older students for independent reading during the weeks you linger with this composer. Other For Further Study resources are listed if you would like to learn more.
3. Once every week or so, give focused listening to a particular piece. Use the Listen and Learn ideas in the back of this book to guide your listening and discussion.

As opportunity presents itself, go to a concert that features the music of this composer so students can listen to a live performance.

A Day in the Life of Handel

(From The Private Life of the Great Composers [1893]

by John Frederick Rowbotham, edited)

The house in which Handel resided in London was on the south side of Brook Street. Here for many years he lived, and here he died; and here every morning, when stage coaches, sedan chairs, three-cornered hats, and knee-breeches were the ordinary objects to be seen in the London streets, Handel might have been found between the hours of nine and eleven receiving morning callers: musicians in search of employment, singers whom he had secured for his operas, and vocalists whose voices he was anxious to try before offering or refusing them engagements.

Handel is at this time the conductor of the popular opera house in the Haymarket and is considered a celebrity in the musical world of London. His popularity is unbounded. The daily papers vie with one another in chronicling the most minute incidents of his life; and paragraphs are constantly appearing in one or the other of them to the effect that “Mr. Handel passed through Devizes this morning on his way to Bath. He stayed at the ‘Swan with Two Necks’ and smoked a pipe of tobacco in the coffee room amid a large circle of admirers” or “Mr. Handel, alighting from his carriage yesterday, strained his ankle slightly, but this did not prevent him from proceeding to the opera the same evening and conducting one of his divine compositions.”

In the meantime, let us follow him at his occupations in Brook Street. Among the company who fill the room—and keep up a constant chatter of subdued conversation despite the musical exercises that are going on—are a celebrated soprano, a tenor, a violinist, a cellist, and a host more. In the midst of them sits Handel at the harpsichord, and by his side stands an Italian vocalist, who is auditioning a solo for the upcoming opera of Lothario, in which he is to play a title role.

Part 1—"He is the master of us all."—Joseph Haydn

George Frideric Handel was born at Halle, in Lower Saxony, on February 23, 1685. His father was a surgeon and sixty-three years of age at the time of his birth—a terribly severe old man, who almost before his son was born had determined that he should be a lawyer. The little child knew nothing of the fate before him, he only found that he was never allowed to go near a musical instrument much as he wanted to hear its sweet sounds. The obstinate father even took him away from the public day-school for the simple reason that the musical gamut was taught there in addition to ordinary reading, writing, and arithmetic.

But love always "finds a way," and his mother or nurse managed to procure for him the forbidden delights. A small clavichord, with the strings covered with strips of cloth to deaden the sound, was found for the child, and this he used to keep hidden in the garret, creeping away to play it in the nighttime when every one else was asleep or whenever his father was away from home doctoring his patients.

But at last, when George Frideric was seven years of age, his father was compelled to change his views. It happened in this way. He set out one day on a visit to the court of the Duke of Saxe-Weissenfels, where another son by a former marriage was a page. George Frideric had been teasing his father to let him go with him to see his elder step-brother, whom he had not yet met; but this was refused. When old Handel started on the stage-coach the next morning, the persistent little fellow was on the watch. He began running after it, and at length, the father was constrained to stop the coach and take the boy in. So,

Water Music Suite No. 2 in D Major, HWV 349: II. Alla Hornpipe

(Disc 1, Track 2; approx. 4 minutes)

On a hot July day in 1717, King George I and noble members of his court boarded his barge on the River Thames for an evening cruise. The Thames is a tidal river, which rises and falls with the ocean tide, effectively reversing its flow. The King's party boarded at just the right time for the incoming tide to push their boat upstream without any rowing, so they leisurely floated through central London. To make the night especially festive, Handel had written three suites, or collections of short pieces, for a 50-member orchestra that would perform on a second barge drifting right alongside. The party must have been a grand sight: witnesses say it seemed like all of London wanted to join the party, either flocking to the river's edge, or, if they had boats of their own, floating as near they could to the barges. The King liked the music so much, he asked for it to be repeated three times.

Here is what the newspaper The Daily Courant had to say about it the next day:

“On Wednesday Evening at about 8. The King took Water at Whitehall in an open Barge, wherein were also the Dutchess of Bolton, the Dutchess of Newcastle, the Countess of Godolphin, Madam Kilmanseck, and the Earl of Orkney. And went up the River towards Chelsea. Many other Barges with Persons of Quality attended, and so great a Number of Boats, that the whole River in a manner was cover'd; a City Company's Barge was employ'd for the Musick, wherein were 50 Instruments of all sorts, who play'd all the Way from Lambeth (while the Barges drove
